SHE WANTED TO KICK.

But Somehow the Gentle Clerk Managed to Talk Her Scheme.

"Is this the water office?" she asked as she entered, with fire in her eye and fight in her voice.

"It is, madam," replied the gentle clerk at the desk. "Is there anything I can do for you this fine morning?"

"There may be, and there may not be," she replied, with much asperity, "but I came in to say that while I was drawing water to make coffee for breakfast a great fish came out of the faucet, and"—

"Oh, I see," the clerk interrupted, with an infuriating smile. "You came in to pay the city for the fish. That was very honest and good of you, I'm sure, but the city will not accept any money for a single fish. It is true the city charges for water only and does not guarantee to furnish fish as well, and I'm bound to say that most ladies would have taken the fish and said nothing about it. However, the city will not take advantage of your unequalled generosity. It will make no charge for it."

With a magnanimous wave of his hand the clerk tried to dismiss the subject, but the caller resumed:

"But this fish was"—

"Oh, yes, I know what you would say. The fish was a fine large one and made an agreeable addition to your morning meal, but still the city would not think of charging you for it. If you are so very conscientious about it, however, you might keep count of the fish that the city supplies in that way, and after you have had, say, a dozen we may make some sort of a charge, but we could not think of accepting pay for one or two, not for a moment."

"Young man," glared the woman, "do you think it is the proper thing to get your fish by way of your water faucet?"

"To be frank with you, madam, I do not think it is, and for that reason I would advise you to say nothing about it, especially among neighbors. If the people generally got to know that the city was favoring you by sending you fresh fish for breakfast in your water pipes, why, we should have streams of people coming in here to kick because the city does not provide them with fresh fish also. You can easily see that the city cannot undertake to do that. Fine morning, but I think we shall have more rain before night."

The clerk resumed his seat, and the complainant departed, muttering something which no one could hear.—Town Topics.
